

How is dictatorship and democracy different?

Everybody can vote and help to choose the government

There are no free elections to change the government

Everybody, including the government, must obey the laws of the land

The government controls the media – newspapers, radio and films – allowing people to see and hear only what it wants them to

People who criticise the government may be tortured, imprisoned or sent to special camps

Secret police keep the people under control, often using brutal methods like torture

People have the freedom to criticise the government and protest about its policies

People can follow and religion they wish

Trade unions are banned

Newspapers can write what they like about the government

A government has a limited time in power, after which voters can choose a different government

How is dictatorship and democracy different?

Everybody can vote and help to choose the government

There are no free elections to change the government

Everybody, including the government, must obey the laws of the land

The government controls the media – newspapers, radio and films – allowing people to see and hear only what it wants them to

People who criticise the government may be tortured, imprisoned or sent to special camps

Secret police keep the people under control, often using brutal methods like torture

People have the freedom to criticise the government and protest about its policies

People can follow and religion they wish

Trade unions are banned

Newspapers can write what they like about the government

A government has a limited time in power, after which voters can choose a different government